

Torrie Harris is Director for the Kentucky Office of Health Equity at the Department for Public Health. Dr. Harris is also an Assistant Professor in the Health Systems Management Department at the University of Kentucky College of Public Health. Since inception of the Office, Dr. Harris has established programs to address cultural and linguistic competency issues, conducted infant mortality health disparities research among African American populations, and engaged over 30 local, state, and national organizations to advance health activities related to racial and ethnic minorities, rural, and low-income populations. Dr. Harris also has published an article in the Journal of Extension on creating partnerships between academic health centers and Extension Agents to better disseminate public health programs to rural populations. Dr. Harris received her Doctor of Public Health degree from the University of Kentucky, College of Public Health in Health Behavior. Prior to coming to UK, she received her Masters of Public Health at Tulane University School of Public Health and Tropical Medicine with a concentration in Maternal and Child Health Care and a Bachelors of Science in Chemistry from Xavier University of Louisiana. Dr. Harris has also worked extensively on child passenger safety, public mental health, adolescent health, and public health systems and services research.